By Rahul Pandita In the late 1950s, Richard Schickel noted that the early works of some film critics were "unacceptably reactionary and tendentious." He suggested that the "hatred and intolerance" expressed in such film criticism "have been as prominent a feature of American film culture as the much celebrated 'American dream.'"¹ One example of such a "relentless" film critic was Andrew Sarris, who was active from the 1950s through the 1980s and whose "cult of personality" was best personified by the power that he exercised over the film community in the 1960s. Sarris would come to embody the late-1960s student film movement, which in turn influenced several directors of the 1970s, including the precocious Eric Rohmer and Michelangelo Antonioni, who was inspired by students of the movement. In The Sixties, Vincent Canby recalled watching Sarris introducing filmmakers by name in his writings: "Michelangelo Antonioni was billed as 'the Sicilian.' I cannot remember, but I think he went to Italy as a boy. He was the most extravagant and magnificent person I have ever met and probably the most talented. Antonioni is now the favorite director of a generation who never reads the critics. The gods of the cinema are f988f36e3a
