I want to compile a C++ project using automake. I have several dependencies that I can install on my system or that I can download from the internet. The projects requires me to compile with a specific compiler. At the moment, I compile it using g++. I don't want to distribute the compiled binary with the dependencies if it's not mandatory. I want to avoid compiling the dependencies separately. In this way, I would need to compile the project using one of the options in the Makefile. I think that I should tell configure and make to use a different compiler to build the project. I also want to set the CC to build the project (not only make -C) and to use a different compiler for the compilation (not a simple compiler). I can't find a way to do it, because it
