Volunteers spent time in classrooms and at camps. More than 300 students, 8 percent of the Columbia Gorge School District's 13,000 students, participated in the program in one month. Instead of a regular school day, teachers and principals encouraged students to spend most of their free time on coding. The district's community tech teacher, Millie Schnabel, recommended that students pick an area of interest to learn about. Students chose food safety, transportation, and data analysis. Students applied to organizations from corporate sponsors and then applied to work on those projects. There were four major projects that students could work on: data analysis, digital security, transportation, and simulations. The first problem students got to work on was developing an app to help people explore a non-profit grocery store's inventory. "So, I'm in my truck, and I have to go, and I'm listening to someone run through a list of problems that I've been working with you on a software project that I'm working on, and it's three o'clock in the afternoon," a student said. "I'm driving to a ski resort to test my equipment that I've been
